In dark tobaccos, frosted and trash; lugs are perhaps a trifle less activ than in December, but the better grades, lucluding Green River and Regie kluds are well sustained. We think there is just now more speculative feeling in these styles than lu any other.

While we think it is usually good business sonse to sell whenever we can get a good paying price, yet thero certainly seems no reason now for farmera to rush their crops into market. Care and judgment la preparing the crop will certainly prove more profitable now than a special hurry to put the crop on the market.

The indications are that farmers are preparing for a very large plantlng this year, but It will take more thau one blg crop to materially re duce pricea.

A SYMPHONY IN LILIES.

A Complex Flirtation and Its Unexpected Ending.

Moner-solling widow,"finally assented Ruthven, rising with characteristic grace and languor; "hut I will wager clams and absluthe for the W three of us after tho Fig. npera, that I find no excuse for the en-

They had pestered him on the subject overy night for a week past and were quite ready to believe mind which he presently asserted that his only object in yielding was to escape at the same time suillelent of thient to lils repeated reliants to he led thither, nuke him fairly conspucious in the areas of letters was rather a noveity, and Ruthven's courteens bearing, preverbial generosity and unfulling wit easily procured him parlng, preverbial generosity and under the line of him, which conclusion was very radely shattered the ensuing when he regarded or affected to regard the general run of taea and things.

They were at his rooms now-light, alry rooms, whose equipment, if not inxurious, bore evidence of the tenant's exceptional taste in the matter of artistic offect - and wulted rather impatiently while he rained three cravats in the effort to achieve a satisfactory bow. Ilis tollet completed, they passed out upon the street, Ruthven observing plaintive-ly as he closed the door behind him that he was "ready for the sacrifice."

His companions laughed lightly and set matches to eigerottes. They were both younger than he, and an necurate observer would have said the pursuit of pleasure was more of an occupation with them than with Ruthven, the latter, however, showing by his manner that he enjoyed their company. It was not long before they turned, and strolling arm-lanrm down a quiet street paused, at n signal from the yonagest of the trie, whom Ruthven addressed as "Gsorge," before a small shop, in the windows of which were displayed a number of tastefully-arranged vases of Illios.

"Ener," said "George," in a half whisper. "And you, Ruthven, post yourself in the rear and observe her, while I purchase me a boutouniera."

"The reached her gonile ears, that being a young lady of impulsive did your friends oil you I was engaged."

They passed in. Ruthvon, who did as he was bidden, observed a 'tail, grave-faced woman, with a face of waxen whiteness, and large, ponetrating gray oyes. Her figure was full, but of graceful outline. She was are but of graceful outline. She was arranging another wase of illies, and Ruthven fell to comparing the time of now. the flowers to that of the lady's hands, without being able to render a verdlet whether you love her or not, on ourth he couldn't "have politeness" without being able to render a verdlet gither way. 11) noted, also, with re-

"Ruthven," rather stornly injected that young man, advancing to the counter. He felt, he did not know why, that If George had attempted to enuceal bls identity under au assumed name he could have found the energy to kick lilm.

Mrs. Fox slightly inclined her head, with its massive coils of linky hair, in schnowledgment of Ruthven's graceful sulutation. He choose to leave the selection of a "button-hole" to her, he said, and felt strangely gratified when sho ignored a pyraniid of brilliant rose-buds and adjusted a thy spray of illies so, and noted the toporing fisgers and wonderfully polished resolution at their extremilles.

A few rounks on ordisary topics and the two left the shop, Goorge lingering behind an lustant, as his enstem was, for an ludividual adieu. Ruthves, glancing back, experienced a thrill of unaccountable annoyance on beholding the young man la another extremely devotional attitude, and the widow's carnation lips parted again in her same duzzling smile.

""Well," asked George, expeciantly, linking his sru in that of his enupantion, "what do you think of her, hey?" "She is hardly beautiful," rejained Ruthven, slowly, after a long pause, und I do act like musculine women.

And yot—she preferred lilles to roses. Yes, I think that in strict justice I owe you the claus and absinthe. "I should enll your friend a symphony in lilles."
At the opera that alght Ruthven was rather more eyalcal and ab-sent-minded than usual. After appointing a rendezvous with his young friends for midaight, he avoided them. The miny acquaintances whom he visited in their hoxes during the evening railied him oa his spparent indifference to the dual charm of Sembrich and Scalchl, something he was never known to have exhibited before. Usually on such nights his glance was fixed liminatably apon the stage, and the expression of his face one of assenceated delight, music heing the one thing he permitted himsolf to grow enthusiastle about Tonight his syes scarcely left the poarl low-hatred girl who sat with her aris-tocratio memma in the conter of the parquette, he was, as usual, deferen-tial, yet gny; witty, but subdaed. Sie had always, as a matter of course, coasldered him the most brilliant, as well as loveable of men, and feund no reason to change her opinion to-night. When he stood bareheaded at the carriage window and bade the two ladles good-night, the big blue eyes of the younger shone lu the glare of the street lump mamma, can you wonder that I love dered nix or seven dollars' werth of lilica for his nweetheart. And the next day, and the next, he came, qulet, synical and self-post-steel as ever. He ordered flowers at every visit, and wldow.

And she? Well, she bad net littleerto numbered among her regular enstomers any one quito so distin-guished or quito so handsome, and she was finttered. Any thing like familiarlty on the part of the young men about town who were her patrons—such as George, fer lustance—she rebuked with such unerring distinctuess as to piqued her, and, of course, as any comnas will under such circumstances, her manner uabent to him just a trifle on that account, the consequences of which was that Ruthven himself unbent, fractionally and seriously, illo came eftener stilli. Ilis betrothed grew fired of lilies, and bade him send her roses for a change. He sent har roses-so many of them that she de-clared she was tired of all sorts of flowers and begged him to cease sending her blossoms of any sort and come oftonor himself, instead. To this day Ruthven cas not account for the fancination the widow exor-clad over him. Her conversation was not exceptionally brilliant, though free from pluttedes. It was her smile, ponsibly, or perhaps, her good taste— the good taste which had led him to bestow upon her that title of "A Symphony lu Lilles."

It was not strange that his conduct should give rise to comment. His two particular friends langued hugely, and then grew grave as they thought of the yellow-haired sweetheart ten blocks away on the same street.

Nor was it strange that a tale should come to the ken of the young lady her-

"I have long noticed the change in minutes, sent back but two words, your demeanor toward me, and have they were "at onee," and long after been at a luss to account fer it until he had vanished out into the street, now. I knew every thing—have the girl in the telephone office was
